The Pearl Clutching of Lunatic Andrew Torba

Gab has always been a shit platform. Ever since it started, it never really innovated. Monopolies are just so much better in the digital realm, because I don't want to have to share my stuff out twenty times. But we live in a hyper-moralistic society of pearl clutchers who fly off the handle at the upsetting of their post-liberal religious bubble. Nigger is now the equivalent of blasphemy and being a proud White person means you must be burned at the stake, or at least lose your job, reputation and perhaps civil liberties. The founder of Gab, Andrew Torba, is an unstable person who created an virtual echo chamber for schizophrenics to fearmonger and share misinformation with each other. Social media is about getting your ideas out to the world, and seeing ideas you don't agree with; it is not supposed to be a race to the bottom to see who can be more edgy.

> People are about to meet Andrew Torba and realize he's worse than Jack Dorsey. The guy is as morally schizophrenic as he is mentally. That's putting it extremely mildly. I don't understand people's short memory. Torba regularly flies off the handle and starts banning things he dislikes. Anyone who speaks up is liable to be banned. The guy is as stable as its platform is intuitive. Capriciousness is a sin. Don't morally lecture me while you defend someone out of ignorance.

He's so interested in free speech, that under ever tweet he posts now, the replies are censored. I still use the platform just as extra step to share my blog articles so they get out there, but the site is worthless otherwise. The free market or "go build your own twitter" is not going to solve deplatforming, because I don't want my stuff to just be seen my mental patients and people who agree with me; I want it to reach as many people as possible. The solution is government regulation of these platforms are public utilities like the phone service. I don't care about the third-rate political opinions of tech CEOs. Shut the fuck up and build a service that is usable.
